The Airport as a Hub of Stories

“The airport is a rare kind of communal space. It brings people from very different walks of life, from disparate backgrounds and distant origins together. For the briefest of times, they cross paths, strangers in a strange place, and their stories get intertwined -and they inevitably change”.

there are no boring people

“Distance shows you so much. When you’ve had a long distance relationship for two years, and yet you know everything about his life, his friends, his family, when he gives you all the time he has... It’s worth it. If you asked me a year ago I wouldn’t go. Now I am certain he is worth it”.

“Did you know that there are 3 million books published in English every year? I’ve written two of those, but I have another six in my head”.

“They took us from the house and put us against a wall because we were Christians. They were going to execute us. Our friends and neighbors rushed to our help. “We know these people”, they said. “They have lived with us for so long. They hurt nobody”. So they let us go. I was 28 at the time”.

“I wanted children to be in an environment where they are the designers and makers of their own toys, where they make decisions for themselves. So I left the public school I was working for and built a different school”.

"I left my island a few months ago, it wasn't working out for me. I went to London, but that didn't work out for me either. So I went to Manchester. I didn't know anyone, but I did get a job, found an apartment, did the paperwork, did everything. I've been working at a very posh restaurant for the past five months. And I'm starting a Film Making course in September".
